To Whom It May Concern:

I believe taking the course should be waived for renewing Notaries as long as they can pass the test with a high grade.

I recently went to renew my Notary commission (which had expired) and I passed the test (I believe I missed two questions, mostly because of the answers available) but I was informed that I still had to take a course which I obviously don't need. I live in Grand Junction and Denver is the closest city where I could attend the classes offered for free through the state. I don't think it's fair that someone gets to make money off me just because I don't live in a big city and if I can pass the test without the course this is downright silly.

I got my first commission back when I worked in a bank in the 80s and 90s and used it often, then I let it rest until my current boss asked me to get recommissioned for my job as office manager so it would be easy to verify my record. I've stayed current enough with the procedures that I can pass the test so why should I have to pay to take a course I don't need just because I hadn't used my seal recently enough to realize it had expired?

Thank you for your time.
