In, at least two, Central American countries (one Nicaragua, being the poorest), citizens are issued an ID card called a Cedula at the age of 18, along with serving as an all purpose Identity Card, this Cedula must be produced at voting stations in order to vote. This at least solves the problem of one area of vote fraud. I understand many in the USA are against voter identification at the poles as a method of lowering the instances of voter fraud, as many cannot afford a drivers license, etc. A possible answer may be to issue a Voter Identification Card at time of voter registration, that must be produced at the poles, and serve as a general ID card, as is the Colorado Identification Card.
