I, along with many American citizens are very concerned about our voting system. There has been no transparency and quite frankly, there is very little confidence that corruption won't find it's way into many of the polling places around the country. 2016 appeared to have provided accurate count information in Colorado, but then, initially, Hillary Clinton was given the delegates. We had to fight to get those delegate votes to Bernie Sanders.

No voting American should ever have to worry and wonder whether their vote will be counted, or, if they will even be allowed to vote once they reach their precinct. I believe the politicians on both sides of the political aisle are so incredibly disconnected from citizens of this country that they simply are not listening to what we have to say. I ask if moral integrity exists among state and federal leadership! I wish the question Secretary's of State around the nation would ask voters if they believe they are being well represented by their state governments because I think most would answer 'no' to that question. The next question asked of voters is how to ensure our votes count because making sure they are accurately recorded in the only way they will ultimately matter.

Your email doesn't really give much information for which to effectively respond. Voters around the country have been lied to over and over again. And yet, leadership at the highest levels will accuse voters of being conspiracy theorists when even various Secretary's of State have admitted the voting corruption within their own states. What I would like you to be asking Colorado voters is how to shut down the fraud to most effectively counter election fraud efforts. We have serious problems in this country and unless political figures at all levels begin to address collusion between party members and corruption within both parties, voters will remain with the feeling of deep-seated distrust for our political offices at all levels. Is there no moral authority within this nation, any longer? I wonder!
